- 1984 International Figurative Exhibition, Mitsukoshi Gallery, Tokyo and Osaka, Japan
Gamarra receives the Candido Portinari Painting Prize at the 1st Havana Biennial, Cuba.
The General Council of Val-de-Marne, France, commissions the artist to create a drawing for lithographs for the Departmental Rose Garden.
- 1983 For Gamarra, 1983 is a particularly intense year, rich in success and international recognition. The Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York, USA, acquires the work Urutau, which later becomes part of traveling exhibitions organized by the Metropolitan Museum, including the Museum of Art of Fort Lauderdale, USA, and exhibitions in Italy. The work is identified and acquired thanks to the renowned Galerie Albert Loeb, a prestigious Parisian institution that has worked with the artist for several years.
- 1980 He founds the Latin American Space, created with the specific purpose of supporting young Latin American artists arriving in Paris, France. Gamarra is appointed director. The Space is composed of 12 Latin American artists from diverse backgrounds, José Gamarra, Alberto Guzmán, Rodolfo Krasno, Julio Le Parc, Fernando Maza, Gontran Guanaes Netto, Luis Felipe Noé, Leopoldo Novoa, Arthur Luiz Piza, Juvénal Ravello, Luis Tomasello, and Jack Vanarsky. It is the first time that a group of artists with diverse aesthetics creates an association of this kind. They take initiatives to promote and disseminate, as much as possible, various aspects of Latin American creation.
- 1977 Participates in the 12th World Theatre Festival, Nancy, France, directed by Jack Lang, the iconic future Minister of Culture under François Mitterrand. Gamarra creates murals with the International Brigade of Painters.
- 1975 The Parma 75 Prize is awarded to Gamarra in Parma, Italy. Gamarra meets Gabriel García Márquez, Nobel Prize in Literature, who acquires one of the artist's works.
- 1972 Joins the Denuncia Group against torture in Latin America, alongside Gontran Guanaes Netto, Julio Le Parc, and Alejandro Marcos. They produce seven works that travel to different countries and are presented together in a Black Chamber of Torture.
- 1970 From Paris, he finds a new creative dynamic, his gaze toward the American continent changes, he observes and penetrates Latin American nature. The painter evokes various eras, events, characters, and objects, conquistadors of the discovery of America, Indigenous peoples, the armed conflicts of the 1970s with helicopters, airplanes, and tanks. The deep green of the landscapes, the precision of the details, the incognito characters in positions of defense, attack, or anguish, surrounded by animals and objects, create drama and lyricism within a perfect aesthetic. They testify to his immense talent for constructing true scenes and eliciting the full range of emotions. The exuberant vegetation is a kind of novel in which magical jungle landscapes describe an entire aesthetic and social universe. They have infused his phenomenal creativity for several decades. Social engagement and concern for the preservation of nature have long been central themes of his intense artistic activity. Gamarra has always believed it was possible to live in harmony with nature. The ecological message is an integral part of his art. "There is always a story to develop," he confesses.
- 1963 Brazilian Embassy Prize and Bronze Medal at the 18th National Salon of Plastic Arts, Montevideo, with the work Painting M.63721. Curiosity, the need to see original works, and confrontation with other artists lead him to Europe. The European experience is fundamental from his arrival in France in 1963. Artists in Uruguay were influenced by the Torres García school, a very rigid school with a very dark palette. "In Europe, I saw the explosion of colors," Gamarra recounts.
- 1962 Participates in the 3rd Biennial of Young Painters of Montevideo and the 3rd Biennial of Young Painters of Paris, where he receives the Painting Prize and a scholarship from the French government.
- 1960 He is appointed professor of painting and fresco at the Álvares Penteado Foundation in São Paulo. The four years he lived in Brazil, 1959 to 1963, were fundamental to his artistic consolidation.
- 1959 With a refined technical training, he receives an Itamaraty scholarship from the Brazilian Ministry of Foreign Affairs to study printmaking at the Museum of Modern Art of Rio de Janeiro with Johnny Friedlaender, and painting at the Institute of Fine Arts of Praia Vermelha with Iberê Camargo.
- 1958 Receives the 3rd Council Prize at the 3rd Autumn Salon of Plastic Artists of the Interior, Uruguay.
- 1957 Receives the 3rd Painting Prize at the 2nd Autumn Salon of Uruguayan Plastic Artists, Bronze Medal, and the Senate Chamber Prize for the painting Still Life. The creation of a highly personal abstract plastic language composed of monochrome signs, calligraphy, reliefs, sophisticated textures with dark colors and strong visual impact marks for several years the highly recognizable Gamarran style of this period. Gamarra explores creative possibilities through still life, develops forms and new techniques, adopts innovative materials such as rubber on canvas allowing relief. With a curious and meticulous spirit, within a dark tonal range, he creates quasi-monochrome compositions while preserving aesthetics. He expresses himself through a wide variety of techniques, watercolor, Chinese ink, gouache, oil, acrylic, and mixed media.
- 1953 Visits the 2nd São Paulo Biennial, Brazil, one of the most important in the art world. It takes place in Ibirapuera Park, whose buildings were designed by Brazilian architect Oscar Niemeyer, future architect of the capital Brasília and of the headquarters of the French Communist Party in Paris. Gamarra is impressed by the number of works and famous artists exhibited, particularly Picasso's emblematic Guernica, around sixty works by Paul Klee in a room dedicated to him, the Cubists Braque, Delaunay, Marcel Duchamp, Juan Gris, Fernand Léger, Marie Laurencin, Piet Mondrian,

- and the Uruguayans José Cuneo, Julio Alpuy, Costigliolo, Gonzalo Fonseca, María Freire, Torres García.
- 1950 From the age of 16, he participates in National Salons and enters the School of Fine Arts of Montevideo, where he studies painting and printmaking with solid technical mastery.
- 1947 Exhibits at the Ateneo of Montevideo and at the School of Fine Arts even before being formally admitted as a student.
- 1945 Exhibits drawings and portraits in a group exhibition in Montevideo, Uruguay.
